

Eating disorders in middle aged women

The prevalence of eating disorders has increased significantly in the last 25 years. Because of the high prevalence of eating disorders, it is important to understand the risk factors for eating disorders; both genetic and environmental factors. The prevalence of eating disorders is higher in women than in men. The prevalence of eating disorders is higher in middle aged women than in young women. The prevalence of eating disorders is higher in middle aged women than in older women. The prevalence of eating disorders is higher in middle aged women than in younger women.